It was played online using a software program called ZORK-II, written by Jon Freeman. The object of the game is to defend a single ant colony from attack. There are two control machines named "Master-Drive" and "Replicator". When a colony is attacked it must be defended by the "Replicator", which is controlled by the "Master-Drive". The goal is to defend the colony and then, having repaired it, defend it from the next attack. Each colony can be attacked only once, so the objective is to defend a colony until it is destroyed by the attackers. How to play Slavemaker is a multiplayer computer game in which a number of players attempt to destroy the ant colony of their opponents. Each colony is represented by a single ant, placed in a predetermined grid. The game begins when all ants are placed on the starting grid, and the game is played over a number of rounds. Each player must be in the ants control room at the same time. The ant in the control room will execute the action (when the player presses a key on the keyboard) on the screen and will move. The ant moves within the grid; if the ant goes outside the grid, the game is over. Players may change the game settings: number of ants, ant speed, ant aggressiveness and ant reserve. When a player loses his colony, the game is over. Players get points for each colony destroyed by their opponents. There is also a "Help" screen, where players may ask for the rules to be explained or change the game settings. If the player wants to quit, the game is over. The game is over when all the ants are killed or the control room is destroyed. Feature of the game Slavemaker was developed by John Copple, founder of Infogrames, under his Zork-II program. Slavemaker was written in the 16-bit Zork II programming language, and the game was designed for a keyboard, by using the keyboard to order the computer to carry out actions (as in adventure games). The use of the same language to produce a multiplayer
